

A patient can have multiple test panels.
A "test panel" is a collection or a batch of lab tests that are usually carried in a single day.

A "lab result" represents the value a patient obtains for a specific lab test.

A lab test is the generic type of test the patient can take. For example, a real-life entry could be blood Platelet count. It also contains reference values which can be used to compare the patient's actual value.